Athletes are seen as heroes because they can do things that most of us can't do. Some can hit fastballs coming at them at 100 miles an hour. _(1)_ can jump and hang in the air or throw a ball over a net. Athletes _(2)_ are champions also show personal qualities such as perseverance, dedication, generosity, and the ability to keep their cool under pressure. Further, many high-profile players work hard to be _(3)_ role models to children. They raise money for charities and act as mentors, talking to student groups and volunteering their time to programs that help kids stay off drugs and stay in school. Separating an athlete's professional and personal life can be tough. When a sports star gets in trouble with law, or _(4)_ something wrong in his or her private life, fans often feel _(5)_. Before he died, Mickey Mantle, the great baseball player who had serious alcohol problem, told young ball players and the fans who idolized and admired him to "play like me; don't be like me."

Some nations are "Super Aged" - the term for countries where at least 20 percent of the population is 65 years or older. In five years - six more countries will join the ranks of the super-aged. And by 2030 - that number will rise to 34. That will translate into reductions in labor supply. At the same time, aging means that the household savings rates will go down, which will negatively impact on investment. Both trends put together would mean that aging will have a significant negative impact on global growth. But experts say it's not too late to mitigate the economic impact of the world's aging populations.

While consumer buying patterns will change as populations age, targeted career training and productivity gains through technology could offset the decline in workers. Aging will be less of a challenge in countries where elders are seen as assets rather than liabilities. But nearly all the experts say young workers, in the future, will work longer and retire later than seniors today.
