It is a strong belief among certain groups of people that the medical community should take every possible step to keep a person 31, without regard for the quality of that person's life. But other people 32 just as strongly that patients who are facing a life of pain and encumbrance on others have the right to decide for themselves whether or not to continue with life-prolonging medications and therapies.

The question, however, is really far more difficult than just the issue of a terminally ill patient of sound mind who directs the physician not to continue with any treatment that does not in any way cure the disease but only helps to draw out a painful death. When the quality of life has disintegrated, when there is no hope of reprieve, 33 there is intense and everpresent pain, does the patient have the right to be put to death? The patient in this case is not asking the physician to discontinue treatment 34 instead is requesting the physician, the supposed 35 of life, to purposefully bring a life to a close.
